Tess Marshall has just finished her first day of class and she is really hungry.

She is already stressed because she has a buzzfeed article to finish before her next class, but she is still hungry. She is also on a strict Caesar Salad diet based on a buzzfeed article.

It is only her first week in this new university setting and she is still getting used to the campus. She looks around to see if there are any restaurants nearby. She does not find any.

She has an idea. She opens the Grub App, filters the restaurants based on location and whether or not they have caesar salad. Apparently there is one restaurant around the corner.

She has found a food court that is really close and has caesar salad and was able to eat while writing her salad.

She walks into her next class well-fed, and also feeling accomplished after finishing that article. She is there ready to learn.

Janet Jones has been in between her classes, homework and actual work all day.

She has been eating junk food all day and decided it was time for a real meal.

She's getting so hungry, but is stuck with a dilemma. Her favorite places sometimes have a long waiting line. She doesn't have time to walk to the place and only then find out that her food won't be ready by the time of her next class

She's trying to think of the best restaurant to go to, but can't figure it out, she's getting more stressed and hungry just thinking about what to do

When all of the sudden she remembers the Grub app! She opens the app and filters the locations near her by wait time.

She is able to find the restaurant with the fastest wait time and gets her food efficiently and in time before her next class starts

Vincent Pace wakes up at 2 PM like he does on any other day where he doesn't HAVE to get up earlier.

He feels a little hungry but he really doesn't want to go stand in a line that's gonna take away from his Netflix time.

Vincent looks online to see if he can find the easiest place to go to and he finds an apps that claims it will help him.

He uses the app to find a campus dining option near him that has a short wait time.

Vincent walks 5 minutes across the street to a dining hall that he didn't even know existed. There's no wait so he gets his food right away and he's happy.

Vincent goes right back across the street and eats his delicious food in bed while he wastes his life away watching Netflix the rest of the day.
